

Helping your children choose books they will love

Lovereading4kids.co.uk is a book website created for parents and children to make choosing books easy and fun

opening extract from

Peter Pan and Wendy

written by

J.M. Barrie

illustrated

Robert Ingpen

published by

Templar Publishing

All Text is Copyright © of the Author / Illustrator

please print off and read at your leisure.

Centenary Edition

PETER PAN AND WENDY

J.M. Barrie

Illustrated by
Robert Ingpen

Foreword by
David Barrie

templar publishing

A TEMPLAR BOOK

This edition published in the UK in 2004 by Templar Publishing,
an imprint of Templar Publishing,
The Granary, North Street, Dorking, Surrey, RH4 1DN
www.templarco.co.uk

Originally created and produced by
PALAZZO EDITIONS LTD
15 Gay Street
Bath, BA1 2PH

Text © Special Trustees of Great Ormond Street Hospital Children's Charity (GOSHCC)
Teardrop Logo © 1989, GOSHCC. Peter Pan Logo ★ 2003, GOSHCC.
Registered Charity No. 235825
Foreword © 2004 David Barrie
Illustrations © 2004 Robert Ingpen
Design and layout © 2004 Palazzo Editions Ltd
Jacket cover design © 2004 by The Templar Company plc

Designed by BigBluDesign

9 10 8

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means – electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise – without the prior written permission of the publisher.

ISBN 978-1-84011-250-4

A CIP catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Printed and bound in China by Imago

Foreword

I was asked to contribute a brief foreword to this new, illustrated edition of Peter Pan and Wendy because I am one of J.M. Barrie's closest surviving relatives. He was my grandfather's uncle, and therefore my great-great-uncle. By the time of his death in 1937 Barrie was a rich and famous man. He had written many highly successful novels and plays, of which Peter Pan, first performed in 1904, is and will always remain by far the best known. He had become a baronet, he had been awarded the Order of Merit and had received many other honours; in short, he had achieved all his worldly ambitions. He was not, however, a happy man: his marriage had been a failure and he had no children of his own.

Before he wrote Peter Pan, Barrie had befriended the Llewelyn Davies family, and he was later to become the guardian of the five young boys when their parents both died. The Llewelyn Davies children were Barrie's surrogate family and his devotion to them was complete. They in turn helped to inspire the character of Peter Pan, who was created, according to Barrie, by rubbing the five of them together violently, 'as savages with two sticks produce a flame.' While they were young, the boys returned his affection, but the close relationship they enjoyed could not last. As they grew up, they inevitably drew away from their adoptive parent, and worse was to come. One of the boys died in the First World War, and then another drowned while a student at Oxford. The death on the Somme of my grandfather, his favourite nephew, was another hard blow. Barrie was crushed by these losses and never fully recovered from them.

I never met Barrie because he died long before I was born, but I learned quite a lot about him from my late father, Alexander Barrie, who used to visit the great man at his flat in Adelphi Terrace, and played for his private cricket team, the Allahakbarries. The flat was huge, with magnificent views up and down the river Thames. There was an inglenook fireplace, and the walls were panelled with tropical wood sent to Barrie from Samoa by his friend (and hero) Robert Louis Stevenson. This friendship, though conducted entirely by correspondence, was a significant one. Stevenson, like Barrie, was a successful Scottish writer, and a brilliant creator of children's stories, including that other great pirate story, Treasure Island. But in one notable respect Stevenson was very different: as well as being a writer, he was an adventurer who was to end his days in the South Seas. Barrie was painfully aware of his small size and had enormous admiration for those, like Stevenson, who had the courage to take physical risks (he was among those who sponsored Captain Scott's fatal expedition to the South Pole). The story of Peter Pan is complex, but it clearly reflects Barrie's own frustrated longing for adventure, a longing that is, of course, shared by every child.

In 1929 Barrie donated all his rights to Peter Pan to Great Ormond Street Hospital for Children. This gift was later confirmed in his Will, with the stipulation that its value should never be publicly revealed.

Normally copyright in these works would have expired 50 years after the author's death in 1937, and the flow of royalties would then have ceased. However, a unique Act of Parliament passed in 1988 granted Great Ormond Street Hospital the rights to royalties from Peter Pan and all its derivatives in perpetuity, thus ensuring that the Hospital will continue to benefit from the royalties for as long as the story of Peter Pan is enjoyed.

Barrie himself said nothing about the motivation for his extraordinarily generous gesture. The dedication to the first published version of Peter Pan, which appeared in 1928, however, provides a clue. Addressing all five Lewelyn Davies children, two of whom were by then long since dead, Barrie asks 'that in memory of what we have been to each other you will accept this dedication with your friend's love.' I believe his devotion to 'The Five' also lay behind his gift to Great Ormond Street Hospital.

J.M. Barrie

DAVID BARRIE
December 2003

Contents

Peter Breaks Through	8
The Shadow	22
Come Away, Come Away!	36
The Flight	56
The Island Come True	72
The Little House	88
The Home Under The Ground	100
The Mermaids' Lagoon	110
The Never Bird	128
The Happy Home	132
Wendy's Story	141
The Children Are Carried Off	151
Do You Believe In Fairies?	158
The Pirate Ship	169
'Hook Or Me This Time'	179
The Return Home	191
When Wendy Grew Up	202

Peter Breaks Through

All children, except one, grow up. They soon know that they will grow up, and the way Wendy knew was this. One day when she was two years old she was playing in a garden, and she plucked another flower and ran with it to her mother. I suppose she must have looked rather delightful, for Mrs Darling put her hand to her heart and cried, 'Oh, why can't you remain like this for ever!' This was all that passed between them on the subject, but henceforth Wendy knew that she must grow up. You always know after you are two. Two is the beginning of the end.

Of course they lived at 14, and until Wendy came her mother was the chief one. She was a lovely lady, with a romantic mind and such a sweet mocking mouth. Her romantic mind was like the tiny boxes, one within the other, that come from the puzzling East, however many you discover there is always one more; and her sweet mocking mouth had one kiss on it that Wendy could never get, though there it was, perfectly conspicuous in the right-hand corner.

The way Mr Darling won her was this: the many gentlemen who had been boys when she was a girl discovered simultaneously that they loved her, and they all ran to her house to propose to her except Mr Darling, who took a cab and nipped in first, and so he got her. He got all of her, except the innermost box and the kiss. He never knew about the box, and in time he gave up trying for the kiss. Wendy thought Napoleon could have got it, but I can picture him trying, and then going off in a passion, slamming the door.

Mr Darling used to boast to Wendy that her mother not only loved him but respected him. He was one of those deep ones who know about stocks and shares. Of course no one really knows, but he quite seemed to know, and he often said stocks were up and shares were down in a way that would have made any woman respect him.

Mrs Darling was married in white, and at first she kept the books perfectly, almost gleefully, as if it were a game, not so much as a Brussels sprout was missing; but by and by whole cauliflowers dropped out, and instead of them there were pictures of babies without faces. She drew them when she should have been totting up. They were Mrs Darling's guesses.

Wendy came first, then John, then Michael.

For a week or two after Wendy came it was doubtful whether they would be able to keep her, as she was another mouth to feed. Mr Darling was frightfully proud of her, but he was very honourable, and he sat on the edge of Mrs Darling's bed, holding her hand and calculating expenses, while she looked at him imploringly. She wanted to risk it, come what might, but that was not his way; his way was with a pencil and a piece of paper, and if she confused him with suggestions he had to begin at the beginning again.

'Now don't interrupt,' he would beg of her.

'I have one pound seventeen here, and two and six at the office; I can cut off my coffee at the office, say ten shillings, making two nine and six, with your eighteen and three makes three nine seven, with five nought nought in my cheque-book makes eight nine seven – who is that moving? – eight nine seven, dot and carry seven – don't speak, my own – and the pound you lent to that man who came to the door – quiet, child – dot and carry child – there, you've done it! – did I say nine nine seven? yes, I said nine nine seven; the question is, can we try it for a year on nine nine seven?

'Of course we can, George,' she cried. But she was prejudiced in Wendy's favour, and he was really the grander character of the two.

'Remember mumps,' he warned her almost threateningly, and off he went again. 'Mumps one pound, that is what I have put down, but I daresay it will be more like thirty shillings – don't speak – measles one five, German measles half a guinea, makes two fifteen six – don't waggle your finger – whooping-cough, say fifteen shillings' – and so on it went, and it added up differently each time; but at last Wendy just got through, with mumps reduced to twelve six, and the two kinds of measles treated as one.

There was the same excitement over John, and Michael had even a narrower squeak; but both were kept, and soon, you might have seen the three of them going in a row to Miss Fulsom's Kindergarten school, accompanied by their nurse.

Mrs Darling loved to have everything just so, and Mr Darling had a passion for being exactly like his neighbours; so, of course, they had a nurse. As they were poor, owing to the amount of milk the children drank, this nurse was a prim Newfoundland dog, called Nana, who had belonged to no one in particular until the Darlings engaged her. She had always thought children important, however, and the Darlings had become acquainted with her in Kensington Gardens, where she spent most of her spare time peeping into perambulators, and was much hated by careless nursemaids, whom she followed to their homes and complained of to their mistresses. She proved to be quite a treasure of a nurse. How thorough she was at bath-time, and up at any moment of the night if one of her charges made the slightest cry. Of course her kennel was in the nursery. She had a genius for knowing when a cough is a thing to have no patience with and when it needs a stocking round your throat. She believed to her last day in old-fashioned remedies like rhubarb leaf, and made sounds of contempt over all this new-fangled talk about germs, and so on. It was a lesson in propriety to see her escorting the children to school, walking sedately by their side when they were well behaved, and butting them back into line if they strayed. On John's footer days she never once forgot his sweater, and she usually carried an umbrella in her mouth in case of rain. There is a room in the basement of Miss Fulsom's school where the nurses wait. They sat on forms, while Nana lay on the floor, but that was the only difference. They affected to ignore her as of an inferior social status to themselves, and she despised their light talk. She resented visits to the nursery from Mrs Darling's friends, but if they did come she first whipped off Michael's pinafore and put him into the one with blue braiding, and smoothed out Wendy and made a dash at John's hair.

