

Helping your children choose books they will love

Lovereading4kids.co.uk is a book website created for parents and children to make choosing books easy and fun

opening extract from

21st Century Boys:

How Modern Life is Driving Them Off the Rails and How We Can Get Them Back on Track

written by

Sue Palmer

published by

Orion Books

All Text is Copyright © of the Author / Illustrator

please print off and read at your leisure.

21ST CENTURY BOYS

SUE PALMER

Copyright © Sue Palmer 2009

The right of Sue Palmer to be identified as the author of this work has been asserted by him in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

First published in Great Britain in 2009 by Orion Books
an imprint of the Orion Publishing Group Ltd
Orion House, 5 Upper St Martin's Lane,
London WC2H 9EA
An Hachette Livre UK Company

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

All rights reserved. Apart from any use permitted under UK copyright law, this publication may only be reproduced, stored or transmitted, in any form, or by any means, with prior permission in writing of the publishers or, in the case of reprographic production, in accordance with the terms of licences issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency.

A CIP catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

ISBN-13: 978 0 7528 9011 1

Designed in Quadraat by Geoff Green Book Design, Cambridge
Printed in Great Britain by Printed in Great Britain by Clays Ltd, St Ives plc

The Orion Publishing Group's policy is to use papers that are natural, renewable and recyclable and made from wood grown in sustainable forests. The logging and manufacturing processes are expected to conform to the environmental regulations of the country of origin.

Every effort has been made to fulfil requirements with regard to reproducing copyright material.
The author and publisher will be glad to rectify any omissions at the earliest opportunity.

www.orionbooks.co.uk

CONTENTS

Introduction: Meet the boys	1
Why a man-made world is making boys' lives toxic ... and how we can raise boys fit to meet the challenges of a new century
Chapter 1: The fragile male	24
Why baby boys need mothering more than ever ... and why modern mothers need support
Chapter 2: A mind of his own	47
How mother love helps boys grow up bright and balanced ... and how modern life can dumb them down
Chapter 3: Good habits and bad influences	73
How big business undermines parents' authority and confidence ... and the effects on boys' health and well-being
Chapter 4: One of the boys	98
Why little boys need to play, run about and fight ... and why adults must let them get on with it
Chapter 5: Unwillingly to school	126
Why literacy is vital to boys' all-round development ... but starting too early does more harm than good

Chapter 6: Battery-reared boys	149
How boys' freedom is increasingly constrained ... and why a 'cotton-wool culture' damages us all
Chapter 7: School versus cool	179
How education and marketers battle for control of boys' minds ... and why parents and teachers have to redraw the battlelines
Chapter 8: Mother Nature's sons	208
How 21st century forces can hijack human nature ... and why adults have to help boys rise above the quick-fix instincts
Chapter 9: Boys and men	241
Why boys need quests to pursue, codes to live by and mentors
Chapter 10: Lost boys	267
Why some boys are born to lose ... and how those born to win add to their troubles
Epilogue	300
Notes and References	308
Bibliography	337

Introduction

MEET THE BOYS

Why a man-made world is making
boys' lives toxic ...
and how we can raise boys fit to meet the challenges of a new century

Meet Dylan. Five years old and in a state of perpetual motion. Happiest when outdoors – running, tumbling, climbing, fighting. Indoors he squirms and jostles, limbs flailing all over the place. According to his mum, he only ever seems at peace in front of the TV (although perhaps peace is the wrong word – more a sort of zombie-like trance). According to his teacher, Dylan is a real handful, always getting into fights and mischief and already having problems in class: she worries for his future. And she's finding more and more little lads with Dylan-like behaviour arrive in her class every year.

Perhaps you'd rather meet Ozzy. Eight-and-a-half, going on 30. He'll engage you in very serious conversation, and would love to show you his remarkable collection of fossils. Ozzy's parents hope he'll eventually make it to Cambridge, but realise that his immediate problem is to find some way of relating to his classmates. They're worried that the relentless teasing might soon turn into something worse. Ozzy's teacher, on the other hand, isn't so sure it's all the other kids' fault. She too finds Ozzy extremely annoying: if a subject takes his fancy, he'll work like a Trojan, but if it doesn't, he's a menace and can be very disruptive ...

You'd probably prefer to avoid Leo. He's 14 and really pissed off with school. He just about coped at primary, but since starting secondary it's been downhill all the way. He's now such a handful that his teachers are secretly grateful when he bunks off, but his mum is terrified. Leo is hanging out with a very disreputable-looking crowd and she fears he might be taking drugs. He's definitely smoking and drinking, messing around with girls he calls 'bitches' and 'hos', and out on the streets with his new mates till all hours. The police have been round a few times, and told her she has to keep him under control. But what can she do? – he's bigger than her now ...

Still, you're unlikely to bump into Kevin, 16. He disappeared into his black-painted bedroom many moons ago and nobody's seen much of him since. His parents hear the door slam as he leaves for school, then again when he returns – but apart from brief encounters for the exchange of food and washing, they've given up trying to communicate. He's supposed to be revising for his GCSEs, but he might be hacking into the White House computer for all they know, or racking up a nightly death toll on Grand Theft Auto IV. Kevin's always been a bit difficult to talk to ... and far too keen on computer games. Now his parents fear he's given up on this world and taken up virtual residence somewhere else.

Boys have always been boys – restless, impulsive, excitable, obsessive, aggressive, inscrutable – but in an overcrowded, over-heated, 21st century world their boyishness seems to be more of a problem. These four are fairly extreme examples, of course, but many parents I meet see echoes of behaviour from one or more of them in their own sons – not to mention their son's friends, and the boys they see out on the streets and in the malls. So maybe we need to talk about Kevin, Leo, Ozzy and Dylan ...

Do we need to talk about boys?

During the last few years, there's been what newspapers call a 'moral panic' about childhood – every day seems to bring more stories of disturbed children or disaffected teenagers. A couple of years ago UNICEF reported that, on a range of measures of well-being, British children were the unhappiest in the developed world, while a think tank found that the UK had the worst behaved teenagers in Europe – at, or near the top of, the poll for drug abuse, binge drinking, underage sex and youth crime.

None of this came as a surprise to British teachers, who'd noticed a steady deterioration in children's behaviour and capacity to settle at school over at least two decades. It was their concern that led me – as a literacy specialist – to spend three years interviewing experts from a range of disciplines to find out what was going on. In Toxic Childhood, published shortly before the official reports began to appear, I collated research showing how junk food, poor sleeping patterns, a screen-based sedentary lifestyle, the wrong sort of childcare and educational experiences, family fragmentation and the effects of consumer culture can affect children's development. Many youngsters now suffer from a combination of these factors – a dangerous cocktail that's bound to have an effect. So as well as fuelling childhood obesity, 'toxic childhood syndrome' damages the brains of a growing number of children.

As I ferreted about among the statistics, it became depressingly obvious that boys were particularly affected. In terms of school work, they'd begun to lag behind girls in the 1980s, gone into free fall in the 1990s and – although government threw money and initiatives at them for over ten years – are still languishing in their sisters' shadow. Girls now out-perform boys in every subject of the curriculum except maths and science, with almost 50% going on to university or college, as opposed to fewer than 40% of boys. Considering that, less than a century ago, the chances of a girl even being allowed near a university were negligible, this is a remarkable reversal of fortunes.

Part of the reason is boys' greater chance of suffering from one of the 'developmental disorders', rarely heard of 30 years ago, but now affecting around one in ten children. These include ADHD (attention deficit hyperactivity disorder) and dyspraxia (problems with physical co-ordination), both four times more likely to affect boys than girls, and Asperger Syndrome (a form of autism which causes problems with social relationships) which is nine times as common in males. Academics are at the moment locked in dispute over whether more boys than girls are dyslexic but – whatever the finer points of their argument – they’re at least twice as likely as girls to have problems with reading at school.

Boys come out worst in terms of mental health too. The British Medical Association reported in 2006 that boys in the five to ten age group were twice as likely as girls to have an emotional, behavioural or mental health problem, while among 10 to 15-year-olds 11% of boys had diagnosable conditions, as opposed to 8% of girls. They also found that young men in the 15 to 24 age range were the group most at risk of committing suicide. Indeed, in this age group, suicide is the second most common cause of death.

So yes, I think we should recognise that all is by no means well with children and young people in contemporary Britain, and that boys in particular are getting a pretty raw deal. What’s more, if boys aren’t reasonably civilised, confident and able to exercise self-control by the time they reach their teens, they can become a problem for society: four out of five criminal offences are committed by males. In the words of psychologist Sammi Timimi, who has written widely on the subject: ‘The big difference is that boys externalise their problems and it comes out as bad behaviour – girls tend to internalise it, as sadness. Boys’ issues are therefore issues for others, not just themselves.’

There have always been disaffected young men – scamps, scoundrels, hooligans and ‘juvenile delinquents’ litter the pages of social history – but the fact that youth crime has always been with us doesn’t excuse it. As we learn more about the workings of the human mind, it should be possible to make life and learning easier for boys, so they grow up balanced, happy and able to make their own contribution to society. But at present, more and more 21st century boys seem to fall victim to the toxicity of modern childhood. And if we close our eyes to the problem, hoping it’ll go away, these lost boys’ plight will become an ever greater threat, not just to themselves but to society as a whole.