Tofta was cross.

That was her Jack Rabbit that
the baby was chewing.

And that was her favourite storybook
that the baby was scrunching.

Her mummy said she
had to learn to share.

But this was her very own bedroom
that the baby was going to be sleeping in now.

“I don’t want to share!”
said Tofta. But she had to.

That night, an iceberg floated past Tofta's bedroom window and stopped. It looked peaceful and beautiful. It looked as if it didn't belong to anyone.

"That's going to be my iceberg," Tofta thought. "And I'm not going to share it with anyone."
