

Helping your children choose books they will love

Lovereading4kids.co.uk is a book website created for parents and children to make choosing books easy and fun

An extract from
Lily's Shimmering Spell

Written by Vivian French

Published by
Walker Books Ltd

All Text is Copyright © of the Author and/or Illustrator

Please print off and read at your leisure.

Chapter Two

I managed to get the second cup of tea to Great-aunt Acidity without dropping it. I didn't expect her to say thank you, and she didn't. Instead she sipped it as if it was poison.

"It's too hot."

I didn't say anything. If it hadn't been too hot, it would have been too cold. I never ever got it right.

"Go and get me a biscuit," my great-aunt ordered. "I want a chocolate one. And so does Sweetypie. And don't nibble the edges!"

I tried not to look guilty. I'd had a peek in the tin after breakfast because I was still hungry (the bones left over from Great-aunt's kipper didn't fill me up one little bit). There'd been two biscuits left – and I'd eaten them both.

"I'm ever so sorry," I said as bravely as I could, "but there aren't any."

"You've eaten them all, you greedy little worm!" Great-aunt Acidity raised her stick. "Run to the shop! Get more biscuits! NOW!"

"But..." I jumped out of reach. "I haven't any money..."

"Stupid girl!" Polly danced up and down her perch. "Stupid girl!"

Great-aunt scowled, and fished in her old leather bag for some money. "Here! I want the BEST chocolate biscuits, mind. And you'd better be back before this tea gets cold, or there'll be trouble. Take Sweetypie with you. He'd like a walkies... Wouldn't you, my precious ickle pickle fluffykins?”

“Trouble trouble trouble! Stupid girl, stupid girl!”

I made a face at Polly and went to fetch Sweetypie’s lead. He growled, and snapped at my fingers as I clipped it onto his collar. He always does that, and I sighed.

“Sighing? What have YOU got to sigh about, Lily Hawkins?” Great-aunt snapped. “I took you in when nobody else would have you. I fed you, clothed and educated you! What more could you ask for?”

I didn’t say anything. What was the point? All I wanted was for her to smile at me sometimes. Or give me a hug. Or even call me her ickle pickle fluffykins.

I hauled Sweetypie out through the battered old front door and across the road to Mrs Shah’s shop. I bought the chocolate biscuits, and when Mrs Shah asked me how I was, I said, “Fine, thank you,” the same as I always did.

“And how’s Miss Acidity?” she said. “We never see her outside the house. She’s lucky to have a pretty young girl like you to look after her.”

“Erm ...” I said. “She doesn’t get out much. Not at all, really.”

Mrs Shah gave me a lovely smile, and tucked a toffee into my pocket. “There. And give your auntie my best wishes.”

She was so kind I got a lump in my throat, and only just managed to thank her. “Come on, Sweetypie,” I said gruffly, and we went outside...

...and the road was filled with fog. Thick fog. Very thick fog.

I couldn’t even see our house. I took a deep breath and dived into the thick swirls of white. A moment later, I saw steps in front of me, and I stared at them.

What was happening? Where had they come from? I'd only just that minute stepped off the pavement...

"WOOF!" Sweetypie gave a sharp bark and dashed away as if he had seen his dinner. I was so surprised I let go of his lead, and he bounded up the steps and into the nothingness of the mist.

“Sweetypie! NO!” I shouted, but he took no notice. I had to run after him. What else could I do? I jumped up the steps and there was a door and it was wide open – and I was just in time to see Sweetypie vanish inside.

“COME BACK!”

I yelled, but of course he didn’t. So I followed him.

