

Helping your children choose books they will love

LoveReading4kids.co.uk is a book website created for parents and children to make choosing books easy and fun

Opening extract from Saved

Written by Eleanor Updale

Published by Barrington Stoke Ltd

All Text is Copyright © of the Author and/or Illustrator

Please print off and read at your leisure.

LoveReading  .co.uk

For Jim, Andrew, Catherine and Flora

First published in 2008 in Great Britain by
Barrington Stoke Ltd
18 Walker Street, Edinburgh, EH3 7LP

www.barringtonstoke.co.uk

This edition first published 2014

Text © 2008 Eleanor Updale

The moral right of Eleanor Updale to be identified as the author of this work has been asserted in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act, 1988

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced in whole or in any part in any form without the written permission of the publisher

A CIP catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library upon request

ISBN: 978-1-78112-365-2

Printed in China by Leo

Contents

1	Crash	1
2	Trapped	5
3	Belief	10
4	Bleeding	13
5	Pastor David	17
6	Waiting	19
7	Watching	23
8	The Plan	27
9	The Early Hours	31
10	Back-up	34
11	The Ruling	39
12	Victory	42
13	The Visit	49
14	Detectives	55
15	The Pastor's House	58
16	The Truth	62

- 1 -

Crash

Luke was upstairs in his room doing his revision when he heard the crash. It wasn't just one bump, but lots of squeals and thumps. He ran to the window and looked down on the mangled cars below.

There was a taxi, with a huge dent in one side. A white van was crushed against a lamp-post, its front bent in by the impact. In the dark, the streetlight was sparking, so that the crash scene was lit up every few moments. On the other side of the road, a lorry had hit a line of parked cars. They had smashed into each other, and one car had risen up and ridden over the roof of another. A red Mini was lying on its side on the pavement.

Luke had never been so excited.

A crash. A real crash. In his street. In boring old Barton Road.

But then Luke saw the people. The back door of the taxi opened, and a woman staggered out, holding one hand to her head. Blood was oozing between her fingers and along the sleeve of her pale jacket.

The taxi driver didn't look hurt, but he was shouting something as he rushed towards the lamp-post. "I'll kill yer. I'll effing kill yer!" he yelled. Then he stopped in front of the van and saw the driver's limp body lying across the bonnet, covered in broken glass from the windscreen.

Looking down from his room, Luke could tell that the man was already dead.

He looked away, trying to get the picture out of his mind. Across the road, the jumbled cars were like toys kicked aside by an angry child. The Mini seemed to have landed on top of a doll. Luke could see its floppy arms and legs sticking out from under the car.

But it wasn't a doll. He knew that, even though he didn't want to believe it. It was a child. And his body buzzed with horror as he realised who it must be. He recognised the shoes. They were the sensible sandals his sister Anna wore.

Their mother always said that anything more modern would be bad for the feet. It was just as well that Luke and Anna were educated at home by their parents. Anna would have been teased if she went to school. No other 13-year-old wore flat shoes with round toes and big buckles.

It must be Anna lying there, crushed under the Mini ...

Luke was desperate to help her.

But it wasn't going to be easy. His parents were out at a church meeting, and they had done what they always did when they left him at home alone – they had locked the front door. They didn't want Luke to go out or, worse still, let someone in. Nothing should stop him from revising for his mock GCSEs. Even Anna was sent to study at the library. She must have got back early. She must have been waiting for her parents to arrive with the keys when the Mini rode up onto the pavement and hit her.

Luke rushed downstairs to the kitchen for the phone. But the handset wasn't there. His father had locked it in the medicine cabinet before he left for church. There was no medicine in that cabinet, just things Luke's parents wanted to keep away from their children: the phone, matches, the power lead from the radio, the aerial lead for the TV.

Luke's parents didn't believe in medicine, but they did believe in evil. And the phone, TV and radio – in fact, almost any electronic gadget – could be evil. Since meeting Pastor David at the Church of the Healer's Message, they saw it as their duty to protect their children from such things.

Luke tried pulling at the door of the cabinet, but it wouldn't open. He ran to the front and back doors. Both were locked. He knew the windows had been painted shut long ago. There was no point trying to open them, so he picked up a chair and threw it through the glass. He climbed out of the window and into the front garden, cutting his hand on the way.